Excerpt: . . . to the darkness, and the fogs, and the universal balefulness of life under impossible conditions of health, all cheerfully endured for the gratification of that gregarious instinct which crowds mortals together in breathless masses making them shun the company of their own souls. But the immediate enquiry for Mr Fletcher on Marthas appearance, immediately convinced her that he was not in evidence anywhere, but that, as she expected, he lay low, and it would be a clever Brer Rabbit indeed who unearthed him. Marthas excuse for his non-appearance was simple enough. He was in the country, a fact that excited no comment in the minds of these lords and ladies of plush and satin, who would have liked the Fletchers better had they not been so sparing in their allusions to our people. To turn master and mistress inside out, their habits, income, appearance,...
