During my time living with my mothers progressive dementia, I lived mostly in isolation with her, care-taking her 24-7. I did not have my long time friends around me, friendships that had been developed over many, many years. Some friends fell by the wayside, the time and distance between us proved too long. Most friends back home were more than happy to receive my calls and provide their love and support. They were a part of a life line to sanity for me, as were the phone conversations and visits from my children and grandchildren. I am grateful to my eldest son for being here to assist me. He would listen to me. He lived in the same world that I did. She would listen to him and occasionally co-operate with me. But sometimes, my son was my mothers enemy also. But, mostly, she was angry with me. All of the time. But, still, I am grateful for the time here that provided the catalyst to heal childhood shame and guilt that had haunted me my entire life. I am grateful for Cash my really smart and sensitive dog who was adopted over a year ago. He became a loyal companion, a most welcome light and diversion into the world of dementia. As mother progressed deeper into her delusional world, I am grateful for all the new friends I discovered in my own virtual reality. So grateful beyond the words to say. I escaped into the world of Face-book, and my primary socialization became my Face-book friends. We have shared positive thoughts and inspiration. We have shared political opinions and aspirations. All we have shared is how I...
