When he did so, he thanked the Cure hurriedly, and declining the assistance which the good priest offered him in the belief that he was faint from marching in the heat, he hurried back towards the village. As he went, however, his eyes lighted on the old farmhouse, and he could not resist the yearning to take one last look at that well-remembered home before he left it behind him for ever. Once more he crossed the threshold, --once more he revisited each room, and stood awhile recalling to memory many a little incident that had happened there in bygone days. Last of all he took a farewell glance round the huge old attic where he himself had always slept, and as his eyes filled with tears that hindered him from seeing the dismal chilling look of its bare walls, there rose up before him visions of the place as once it had been, with his mother bending over his bed, blessing her darling boy the last thing at night. There was the cupboard too in which he used to keep his boyish treasures; it was empty now, save and except some rubbish at the bottom, amongst which there was a misshapen parcel, tied round with string, which had apparently been torn open to ascertain the contents, and then flung down as worthless. Gaspard took it up and held it to the light; it seemed to be...
