The captain was now again taken ill of what he calls a bilious cholic, which was so severe as to confine him to his bed, the charge of the ship devolving on Mr. Cooper. Mr. Patten, the surgeon, proved not only a skilful physician, but an affectionate friend. A favourite dog belonging to Mr. Forster, fell a sacrifice, it being Easter Island. 177 killed and made into soup for the captain; there being no other fresh meat in the ship. A few fish were afterwards caught, which were very acceptable to him. Early on the morning of the 11th of March, 1774, land was seen about twelve leagues distant, which, to the joy of all on board, ultimately proved to be the long sought for Easter Island. On getting near the coast, off a sandy beach, two men in a canoe...
